Heterogeneity in prostate cancer is the driving force in somatic evolution which explains the emergence of resistance to therapies and relapse. We will show a computational agent based model of prostate cancer where tumour cells can adapt to the microenvironment and show how this evolutionary process is responsible and exploits the heterogeneity that makes prostate tumours so difficult to treat.